

Seersucker & Silence: Sample Chapter

If you grew up where I grew up, the fences were never just fences. They were the clean white lines around what people wanted seen, the boundaries that made order look natural. Behind them, horses moved like money made graceful. Houses sat far enough from the road to suggest privacy and close enough to remind you that privacy was also a form of display.

This excerpt is written as a polished sample for the landing page and may be updated as the manuscript moves toward publication.